Atlanta is the capital of the state of Georgia. The city is the center of one of the fastest-growing areas of the United States.

In 2008, the population of Atlanta was just over 1 million. Blacks or African Americans made up 55 percent of the city's population. Twelve percent of the city's total population identify themselves as gay, lesbian, or bisexual.

Considered a major business and transportation center, Atlanta is the world headquarters of The Coca-Cola Company and UPS. Atlanta International Airport is one of the world's busiest airports, and transports the largest number of passengers annually.

Atlanta has hot, humid summers and mild, but occasionally cold winters by the standards of the southern United States.

The city of Atlanta was important during the American Civil War. The fall of Atlanta was a critical point in the War, giving the North more confidence, and leading to the re-election of President Abraham Lincoln and the eventual surrender of the Confederacy.

The Edsel was a brand of car of the Ford Motor Company during the 1958, 1959, and 1960 model years. Due to its disastrous history, the word "Edsel" has become synonymous with failure.

There is no single reason why the Edsel failed, and failed so spectacularly. Popular culture often faults the car's ugly appearance. A consumer magazine cited poor quality. Edsels were fast, but they did not have very good fuel economy. Business analysts cite the weak internal support for the product inside Ford's executive offices. One external factor that affected the success of the Edsel was the economic recession of the late 1950s.

Marketing experts hold the Edsel up as a supreme example of corporate America's failure to understand American people. Indeed, the Edsel is most famous for being a marketing disaster. The name Edsel came to be synonymous with commercial failure, and similar ill-fated products have often been colloquially referred to as Edsels. Since it was such a debacle, it provided a case study for marketers on how not to market a product.

The main reason the Edsel's failure is so famous was that it flopped despite Ford's investment of $400,000,000 in its development.
